

CoreLogic spinoff to add 100 jobs in Austin

Information services company now has about 200 workers in local operations

By Kirk Ladendorf

AMERICAN-STATESMAN STAFF

Thursday, May 27, 2010

CoreLogic , a new multibillion-dollar information services company to be created next week in a corporate spinoff, says it will be expanding its operations in Austin.

The California company, with more than $2 billion in annual revenue, will split from its parent, First American Corp., on Tuesday.

Executives said Thursday that the company, which now has about 200 workers in Austin, will add about 100 new jobs in Austin over the next year as it moves one of its two Dallas call centers here that will be involved with providing escrow services for mortgage lenders.

The move is the second large job-creation news for the Austin area this week. On Tuesday, HostGator , a Houston-based Web-hosting company, said it would open an Austin operation with 200 jobs this year and 100 more in the next few years.

CoreLogic's present Austin operation, called First American Spatial Services, delivers precise geographic information on real estate parcels to mortgage lenders, insurance companies, government agencies and other customers.

The new company encompasses more than 20 different business lines of data, analytics and outsourcing services along with consumer credit and information businesses.

Its executives say the spinoff will be good for investors and employees.

"It allows us to focus on our strengths of collecting data and turning it into strong analysis," said David Rogers, a marketing vice president.

The new company, based in Santa Ana, Calif., will have more than 10,000 employees.

Courtesy of JB Goodwin